reform because it was considered a slow and sure method of bringing the Jews over to Christianity. The revolution of 1848, however, changed the situation. The reformers were democrats who in those days were dangerous radicals. So after two reformers, Holdheim (1840) and Einhorn (1846) had been appointed because of their radical tendencies the orthodox Baruch Lipschuetz, son of the great Talmudic scholar, Israel Lipschuetz, author of Tifereth Israel, was called in 1854. He refused to attend the synagogue until all reforms were repealed. Some of the trustees objected. The case came before the minister. The latter heard that among the reforms which the Landrabbiner would not tolerate was the abrogation of the prayer for revenge for the martyrs' blood (Ab Ha-Hachamvim), his excellency found that this reform was just. He did not want to be punished for the execution of Jews on a ritual murder charge in 1492 in Sternberg. An orthodox member defended it. Your excellency, he said, we have prayed so long and it has not hurt anybody. It won't hurt you either.

Saxe-Meiningen - Hildburghausen, Saxe-Weimar-Eisenach, Anhalt-Desau and Anhalt-Bernburg have gone out of existence. Their Landrabbiner will be the last of their kind, and the new Volksstadt of Tuhringia will need no one to swear the Mikwah attendant and to decree the proper performance of Hagbahah and Gelilah.
